United States1. Field of the

Invention The present invention relates to a recording medium such as an optical disc, on which an image can be recorded and/or reproduced using an image forming apparatus such as a video camera, a digital still camera, and the like. 2. Description of the Related Art Recording of images by the digital still camera was performed by recording an image on a recording medium such as an image memory by using an image file format such as RAW (Red/Fine) developed by Canon Inc., and the like.

In recent years, an input format has been proposed in which images are recorded on a recording medium by the digital still camera using a RAW format. However, in the case of the input format, the image file format stored in a recording medium needs to be re-converted so as to be suitable for recording and display. Further, conversion means such as an image re-converter needs to be provided in the input format, causing a problem of increased cost. On the other hand, according to a video camera, as the video camera becomes popular, it is predicted that image recording will be used in a wide variety of fields in addition to the field of documentary recording. In particular, in the field of sports, when a movie video is output from an image pickup apparatus using an image pickup apparatus such as a video camera, a video camera, and the like, it is desired to simultaneously record an image to be output to the outside, and an image of an image pickup face and a position of an object which is displayed on a display of the image pickup apparatus. On the other hand, a camera is proposed in which if an object is captured, an image of the object is held in an image memory, and if an image of the image memory is displayed, the position of the object is displayed in a
