The first thing to know about Optimizer is that it won't stop working even if it encounters difficulties while running. Thus, there is no need to worry about running the program, closing it in the middle and then restarting it later. On startup, the program presents the main window in which the most important settings can be changed or viewed. Additionally, there are two other tabs that contain useful settings when optimizing a system, such as tweaking system startup, controlling the Windows task manager and viewing the current and default startup apps, as well as checking the folder where Windows shutdown files are stored. There are four main features included within Optimizer: Startup, Users, Services and Folders. Startup Process: When Optimizer is run, it will start searching for all startup programs and then list them in a simple and straightforward manner. You can either select and enable one or disable as many of them as you wish. User Profiles: A user profile consists of an array of startup programs that users can choose to start with their PC each time they use it. It is possible to select a startup profile that will automatically apply on the next boot, or set one that is active only when the user selects a specific shortcut to it. Services: Services are the program that should be listed when a user tries to disable, remove or reboot from the Windows shutdown folder. Windows services are not actually a folder, but rather a package of both .dll and .exe files that are required to maintain the system, even if the programs contained inside are not being used. By default, the program will scan for services and display them in a list. If the user wishes to stop them, he or she can select them and press Ctrl + E, or open the Services window. In the latter case, they can then control the startup options that are available to that specific service. Folders: The folder contains a list of folders, search paths and shortcuts to the startup programs, as well as other default programs. The list of folders is accessed from the System tab, where Optimizer can list all programs included in the Startup folder, including those that are active or available in the Startup folder. It will also tell the user where he or she can find the folder via a shortcut or browse button. In terms of the program's stability and speed, all tests and benchmarks gave good results, with the occasional problem stemming from the inability to capture all the
