An increase in esophageal trauma has been seen with increased endoscopic procedures. This has led to an increase in the numbers of esophageal perforations. One must remember that the majority of these perforations are a direct result of endoscopic procedures. Patients with esophageal perforations should be given the diagnosis as soon as possible. The management is primarily directed at protecting the airways, maintaining esophageal integrity and achieving primary healing. A prospective study was performed to evaluate the different management strategies. The mortality and morbidity rate for esophageal perforations were calculated from the data obtained in this study. The mortality rate was 32%, and the morbidity rate was 54%. Eighty percent of the perforations were secondary to endoscopic procedures. The mortality rate among these was 36%, and the morbidity rate was 41%. Primary suture and drainage of the perforation was successful in 86% of cases. Four patients had open chest operations. Even though the mortality rate for esophageal perforations was higher when the perforation was associated with endoscopic procedure, the mortality rate for these patients did not reach statistical significance. As more and more networked devices are becoming available, the number of possible network-accessible resources is increasing exponentially. The increasing popularity of network-accessible resources is often attributed to the ease of accessing such resources. From the user perspective, accessing these resources can be performed faster and less error-prone than accessing devices locally. However, network accessibility comes at a cost. Specifically, network-accessible resources typically do not have the same level of security and protection afforded to locally-accessible resources. For example, network-accessible devices usually lack input mechanisms with which to protect themselves from malicious attacks. Also, a network-accessible device can expose itself to a wider-range of attacks than a locally-accessible device. In an attempt c6a93da74d
