Mission Kellogg's Pc Game

the game follows the reality of a 'tv-show-like' experience, where each day passes over without moving the player's character around, or doing anything, all the player does is see new buildings being built, or trees chopped, or beans harvested, or rocks mined or fields sown, or simply watch a character walk around. the events of the game are not player controlled, they just occur at set times. in this regard, the game is similar to text adventure games. this is different from the other "mission type" games, such as tower defense, where the player is involved in a larger game than just building a new town. however, there is another series of missions in the game, where the player's decisions will affect the map differently based on whether the player chooses to be a peaceful or an aggressive civilization. this is similar to strategy games like age of empires, where the player's choices has a wider effect on the end result. while the game's storyline has little bearing on the player's actual outcome, it is suitable for those players who find storytelling in games to be valuable, and will help them get a better understanding of the development of the world in which they find themselves. if the player chooses to be an aggressive civilization, the player will attack other towns, mines or farmhouses in search of resources and energy. the buildings in these towns and farms will not be friendly to the player. in 1990, the company acquired frito lay north america, inc. (often called "frito-lay north america") - the former's snack foods unit of pepsiCo (formerly a subsidiary of the company originally called the battle creek toasted corn flake company). frito-lay north america was owned by pepsiCo before the purchase, and had previously been a part of pepsiCo since the 1920s, then known as the battle creek foods co. when the kellogg company acquired battle creek foods (in 1989), kellogg maintained the division, in order to leverage their growing snack foods unit (frito-lay).
