To this end, a legislation has been introduced in the House of Representatives that would repeal Medicare Part D and would ensure that prescription drug costs are no longer a part of Social Security Disability payments for the time being. This legislation could be even more beneficial in the long run because it would no longer be an additional burden on taxpayers as it is now. A part of the reason this isnt even possible right now is because Social Security Disability payments for prescription drugs is excluded from the table of excluded income- and so you cant even get it to recoup the costs of the program. The other part is that Medicare Part D was passed with another bill a few months after Medicare Part B was passed, and the language was written in a way where no future law could actually take it away- so the only realistic way to repeal it now would be to take one half of its funding and give it to a different program entirely. I am not one who likes to talk about how our government doesnt do anything, but the reason for this is because they actually do things that help the people, and this is definitely one of them. This bill would do away with a totally out of hand program that isnt even related to Social Security, and as long as the drug companies dont take action to keep the costs high, it might actually save money in the future. The USSR didnt collapse because of slow economic growth; it collapsed because of stagnant economic growth. Or (in a way that probably has nothing to do with anything) because of a lack of any economic growth whatsoever. Basically, it collapsed because they had no plan for if its collapse was coming and no plan for what to do afterwards. The USSR went down in that sense because it lacked real planning and the capability to make real decisions. Of course, if they did that the people would immediately grow tired of them and take control of the levers of government. That would be a very expensive purge, though, and so they left it to happen. 5ec8ef588b
