There are occasions when we add a few new videos to the video player or host and we start wondering why the video takes a longer time to start. The problem with video is that the data is constantly changing and the video stream will require a lot of buffering. Therefore, in order to avoid the problem, most streaming media applications let you add a download manager. Download Managers You are expected to specify the source address and it will open the target file on your local machine and transfer the media data to your computer. This process can be problematic for users who are working on a slow connection like dial-up, DSL or cable modem. It is not uncommon for some users to experience video freezes or some other common issues. This is why a lot of video streaming applications have a download manager, which will offer a less complicated solution to transfer the video files. In the event that you use the download manager, your streaming media application should be able to display the amount of data to be transferred and the time remaining in the process.
